A workshop in Taipei, Taiwan, is giving new life to bottle caps, food packaging, old toys, and other kinds of plastic waste.

The zero-waste workshop known as Trash Kitchen gives people *hands-on experience in the recycling process.

People take plastic waste, then soften and shape it into a pair of sunglasses within two hours.

Arthur Huang started the company that the workshop. He spoke to Reuters *news agency. He said: “What we are trying to show in the Trash Kitchen is to let you see, feel, touch within minutes how this process can actually work without *secondary pollution, and you can actually turn it into something of value directly in front of you.”

Huang is the *founder of Miniwiz. The company recycles waste material into goods that people want to buy. Miniwiz also produces tiles, bricks, hangers and other daily necessities from plastic and organic waste.

Huang said the company uses a machine it developed in 2017 called a “miniTrashpresso.” The machine processes the waste material for a new use.

Kora Hsieh is *editor-in-chief for fashion magazine Harper’s Bazaar Taiwan. Hsieh said the project making sunglasses is a good way to bring attention to sustainable fashion.

“I think environmental protection and fashion still have a long way to go. As for *consumers, it is important for them to get *first-hand experience, so a workshop like this is very helpful,” she said.

People taking part in the workshop said it made them think twice about producing trash and made them pay more attention to reusable goods.

“I have two children. I need to think about their future. If everyone can do their best, recycle and use less plastic, that will make a big ,” said business owner Debbie Wu.
